Brand New Book ***** Print on Demand *****.A moment of the human body came and passed in the late 19th -early 20th century. For the first time numbers of people from temperate climates travelled far to the north by land and sea and remained there for extended periods of time. Their purpose was to seek resources, animal, mineral and human, to exploit and to find a route that would bypass continental land masses and permit ocean trade of a world scope. The nature of the polar region was not known. It might be continuous land, clusters of islands, ice or open ocean. It might be inhabited or empty, but in any case it was enticing for the knowledge and riches exploration might bring. The body s moment came with the adjustments, physical and symbolic, that explorers made in their approach and withdrawal. The technology the explorers brought, and that brought them, to the north was insufficient to permit their survival under the conditions they entered. The technology matured over many generations by the people already resident in the higher latitudes, often grouped under the collective name Eskimo greatly extended the ability of the invaders to live there once arrived and before they were able to leave. Adoption and adaptation of Eskimo technology included behavioral adaptations more or less successfully completed. Travel technology permitted reaching farther north and having to remain longer than the living technology and skills would be able to sustain life for people from another climate. In the period before transport, clothing, buildings, power supplies and food packaging allowed rapid turn-arounds or longer stays explorers had to find a way to push a presence in the north sustainable for the period time they...
